The peplos, a draped garment reaching from the shoulders to the ankles, was a staple for women. Its simple yet elegant silhouette highlighted the natural grace of the female form. The chiton, worn by both men and women, was a versatile garment that could be adapted for various occasions. Its variations included the Doric chiton, with its distinctive folds and heavy material, and the Ionic chiton, known for its finer fabric and more fluid drape.

Exploring the Majesty of Roman Fashion

From the grandeur of the Roman Empire emerged a distinct and elaborate style of dress. "Costumes of the Greeks and Romans" guides you through the intricate intricacies of Roman attire, from the stately toga to the opulent tunics.

The toga, the quintessential garment of Roman citizenship, was a symbol of power and prestige. Senators and other high-ranking officials wore the toga in its most elaborate form, with its graceful folds and intricate draping. Women of the Roman elite favored tunics, which came in various lengths and styles. These tunics were often adorned with exquisite embroidery and embellishments, reflecting the opulence and luxury of Roman society.
