Their relationship was complex and often difficult. Roosevelt was a pragmatic realist, while Churchill was a visionary idealist. Roosevelt was often critical of Churchill's grand schemes, while Churchill found Roosevelt's cautious approach frustrating.

Despite their differences, Roosevelt and Churchill shared a common goal: to defeat Nazi Germany. They worked together closely to coordinate the Allied war effort, and their friendship played a vital role in keeping the alliance together.

In 1943, Roosevelt and Churchill met at the Casablanca Conference to discuss the next phase of the war. Roosevelt was determined to focus on defeating Germany first, while Churchill wanted to open a second front in the Mediterranean. The two leaders clashed over this issue, and Roosevelt eventually got his way.

Despite their disagreement over the Mediterranean strategy, Roosevelt and Churchill remained committed to working together to win the war. They met again at the Tehran Conference in 1943 to discuss the invasion of France. This time, Churchill got his way, and the Allies agreed to launch a cross-Channel invasion in 1944.

The relationship between Roosevelt and Churchill was not always easy, but it was essential to the Allied victory in World War II. Their friendship and mutual respect helped to keep the alliance together and allowed them to overcome the many challenges they faced.
